SKILLS & FUTURES ZONE

SKILLS & FUTURES ZONE

We live in an age of technological evolution and disruption that is changing the way we will live and work in the future.

What does the future hold for our children? What skills will they require to thrive in an economy disrupted by the fourth industrial revolution? This is the crucial question facing families as they prepare their children for an uncertain future.

The Skills & Futures Zone @ Rand Show 2018 aims to go some way in providing families with the information and resources they need to answer this question. It is intended as a platform at which to inform families of future skills required coupled with opportunities for young people to gain these skills. This will enable families to futureproof their children to follow meaningful career paths.

With over 70% of the Rand Show's audience comprising families with children the Rand Show is the only platform offering opportunity to engage with tens of thousands of families from a broad and diverse range of backgrounds.

Emerging market economies are increasingly being hampered by a gap between the talent they need and the skills readily available within their market. In many instances growth is blocked by the paradox of both an unemployment challenge coupled with a skills crisis as organisations struggle to recruit talent with the skills they require. This imbalance threatens economic development and curtails the ability of these economies to grow and innovate.

The Rand Show invites all organisations, departments and institutions within the education and skills development sector to participate within the Skills & Futures Zone to assist in informing families of the skills that will be required in the future and the opportunities for their children to acquire these skills.
